ECONOMIC CALENDAR 2010

Release dates for US economic indicators and Treasury auctions

This economic calendar covers the period from January 2010 through December 2010. Virtually all of the economic release dates in 2010 are official. Regular weekly dates are not shown: the Johnson Redbook and ICSC-Goldman Sachs retail sales surveys, and the ABC/WP consumer comfort index (Tuesday), the Mortgage Bankers Association survey (Wednesday), money supply and factors affecting reserve balances (Thursday), and assets and liabilities of commercial banks (Friday). The Treasury auction dates shown in the calendar are based largely on the typical patterns, which could change significantly in 2010.

Global Data Watch

- Payrolls and claims bolster confidence that US firms will soon expand
- As US firms look stronger, questions arise regarding Japan's export sector
- Despite impressive growth, EM policy remains unclear to move forward slowly
- BOJ, ECB move in different directions on unconventional policy

The court of claims rule

The biggest risk to our forecast of synchronized above-trend global growth in 2010 is the prospect of an incomplete adjustment by US firms as they transition from retrenchments to expansion. The foundation for job creation and capital spending gains has already been laid by a dramatic shedding of costs, a recovery in savings, and an improvement in financial conditions. History suggests that this turn should come soon and could prove powerful. Despite disappointments in the October data flow, we have maintained our confidence in this framework as our most recent high-frequency indicators (initial jobless claims) has suggested that US job shedding is nearly over.

The signal from November releases on current-quarter growth is indecisive against the mix of data thus far released. If anything, the decline in the output index of our composite global PMI survey to 51.0 last month aligns with a lower pace of global GDP. Flagging elements of the survey were orders/inventory ratio moved closer to demand continues to sit 0-3 car sales rose 3% last month to their August highs which we think likely there development detouring, which would be a key.

The key news came from US payroll levels stabilized but no momentum—the average week. With the weakness in length of labor income has increased three months. This suggests the gains of the recovery—a key.

Equally important is the decline in the weeks following the November slide may prove temporary, which we have estimated as consistent with US private sector employment and

- Our global services output index rebounded almost 3pts to 50.1 in November. We had looked for an increase that would put the indicator close to in line with our global GDP growth forecast of 3.4% (read being about 2.75%). Instead, this month's global PMI is pointing to growth of 2.3%. This gap is not unexpected but it does indicate a downside risk to our current-quarter GDP forecast. Strictly from the standpoint of the PMI surveys (ignoring the fact that US activity data are not sending the same message), those risks appear focused in the US and in Japan.
- This morning delivered another downside surprise in initial jobless claims. With claims holding near 400K for a second week in a row, it is becoming more likely that the recent leg down will be sustained. This would be a very positive message for the labor market, because the current level is near that which we believe to be consistent with stable payrolls. The indicators are more mixed. The Challenger job openings are up down, but the balance index remains well below 50 and is registering substantial job losses.
- The ECB announced plans to add to more quickly than expected. That 12m tender will be the last (as expected) tender will be offered next March (as said) policy rate appear firmly on hold year. Our growth forecast is stronger envision much lower core inflation. A cut the ECB will remain on hold in process such a move is unclear, especially given down QE more quickly than anticipated.
- Euro area GDP growth was confirmed domestic final sales corrected modestly and a positive inventory control weakness of domestic demand stands out, although Japan's export gains (see next slide).
- Japan's M&F corporate survey registered drop in capex, which suggests that the in capex in the 3Q GDP report may go with an expected month-down to above that 3Q GDP growth could get that rate of 4.8% in next Wednesday for a second quarter in a row. The depressed and took a huge hit in the US, where companies slashed labor costs.
